Zuckerberg makes case for shift to video, 'stories'

Facebook CEO says the opportunity will be bigger than news feed over time

Sarah Frier

SAN FRANCISCO

Facebook Inc. CEO Mark Zuckerberg is betting the company's future on video and disappearing posts called "stories," not the company's famous news feed. Investors are buying into the vision for now.

The newer products may make less money and steal user attention from the main stream of photos, comments and lucrative ads on the social network, Zuckerberg warned. Marketers aren't totally comfortable with the new formats yet, and 2019 will be another year of significant investment, he added on a conference call with analysts Tuesday.

Still, the CEO said the opportunity will be bigger than the news feed over time.

Chief financial officer David Wehner also calmed concern about costs next year and quarterly earnings from the company's suggested its business holding up in the wake of scandals and privacy breaches.

Facebook shares rose 3.1% in extended trading, after closing at $146.22 in New York.

Earlier this year, the company said revenue growth rates would decline in the third and fourth quarters, sending shares plummeting. That set a low bar for Tuesday's results.

States and Europe. And new Facebook users often live in less-lucrative advertising markets. That's left the company spending heavily on more experimental projects.

Future revenue depends on Facebook's ability to shift marketers' interest to new ads in messaging services, and marketing spots embedded in a popular way of sharing called "stories," especially on Instagram.

In those formats, users post videos about their day that disappear within 24 hours. Users tap between them and see ads in between.

"I want to be upfront that even assuming that we get to where we want to go...it will take some time and our revenue growth may be slower during that period," Zuckerberg said on Tuesday.

Facebook Watch and Instagram TV, the company's two video services, are way behind Google's YouTube.

In terms of size, Zuckerberg said, the stories format is popular on Instagram and WhatsApp, but on the main social network it's just starting to gain traction. Suitable ads are difficult to make, he added.

Still, Zuckerberg thinks this is how users will share information in the future.

Tuesday's results bought Zuckerberg some time to pursue the new initiatives.

Third-quarter revenue jumped 33%, while profit was $1.76 billion, well ahead of Wall Street projections, according to data compiled by Bloomberg. Monthly active users totaled 2.27 billion, up 10% from a year earlier.

"Facebook grew revenue at a nice pace in the important US and Canada markets," EMarketer analyst Debra Aho Williamson said.

"Facebook also managed to eke out a small usage gain in the US and Canada. After the flatness we saw last quarter, that's a good sign."

The results suggest that advertisers continue to buy more Facebook ads. And they've embraced Instagram, which recently passed 1 billion users.

MILLENNIALS IN SMALL TOWNS MIMIC BIG-CITY COHORT

ORDINARY POST
SHUCHI BANSAL

Respond to this column at shuchi.bansal@live.com

In its festival sale held between 10-15 October, e-commerce platform Amazon claimed it saw more than 80% of its customers come from small towns. Large appliances saw phenomenal sales with more than 50% coming from tier 2 towns and below. Even in fashion, 65% of the orders came from tier 2 and tier 3 cities. Amazon delivered to customers in locations such as Malda (West Bengal), Angul (Odisha), Havelock (Andamans), Hapur (Uttar Pradesh), Tinsukia (Assam) and Dumka (Jharkhand).

Clearly, the millennial consumers in the tier 2 and 3 towns are mimicking those living in tier 1 cities as far as online shopping is concerned. Millennials refer to those born between 1981-1996 or those aged 22-37 in 2018. According to Kishore Thota, director, customer experience and marketing at Amazon India, the age group between 25 years and 35 years is among their biggest customer cohorts. He says millennials in tier 2 towns have the same aspirations as those in metros. "We sell the same iPhone in the remotest part of India. We also sell high-priced beauty products in tier 2 and tier 3 towns. In cohort to cohort comparison, where affordability is not a concern, their purchases are similar," he says. He cites the example of the American sports apparel brand Under Armour—selling exclusively on Amazon—that did well not just in the metros but in smaller towns too. "Of course, the basket size in tier 3 towns may be slightly smaller," he adds.

The similarity between millennials in big and small towns does not end with online shopping. This cohort in tier 2 towns is also open to trying out. Especially, if he gets to experience the same pub and restaurant brands that are available in the metros. A recent report in Hindustan Times said that tier 2 cities are developing taste for big-city dining. Restaurants and pubs from the metros are now opening branches in tier 2 towns—so there's a Farzi Café in Chandigarh, The Flying Saucer Café in Lucknow, Mocha in Raipur and a restaurant called Hoppipola in Ranchi (which is also present in six other cities, including Mumbai). Most of these outlets are frequented by consumers in their twenties. There are several reasons behind their proliferation. For starters, a small-town consumer is aware of all these brands, thanks to social media. This has also fast-tracked the process of food trends reaching tier 2 towns quickly.

Clearly, the lifestyle of the non-metro millennial is increasingly resembling that of the metro millennial. According to V.S. Koman Sitarum, venture partner at Fireside Ventures (which has invested in several consumer product companies), there are several similarities between small-town and big-city millennials: both are tech savvy, and smartphones give them access to the same content (movies, music, sport and shopping opportunities via Amazon, Flipkart and others). "So no longer do the guys in tier 2 towns have to go to big towns to buy stuff. Aspirations on building careers, looking good, keeping up with trends are getting similar," he says.

Like their tier 1 counterparts, consumers in tier 2 and 3 cities are also watching entertainment on digital platforms. According to findings of the media research firm Pwights, the over-the-top (OTT) video streaming consumer in tier 1 and tier 2 towns is equally discerning. Millennials in big and small cities say that they get more variety on OTT than on TV. OTT allows them the freedom of time to watch content that can't be watched with parents but can be consumed in private on a personal device.

Aspirations on careers, looking good, keeping up with trends are getting similar their phones. This cohort is inclined to eschew linear TV in favour of digital viewing.

According to Ashwini Sirsikar, executive director and head of qualitative research at Ipsos, millennials are in their own echo chamber. Tier 1 and tier 2 millennials are digital natives. Instagram is their most preferred social media platform. Facebook is now passé and perceived to be for the older generation.

Millennials also like to experiment with food. Food delivery start-ups like Zomato and Swiggy have made ordering convenient and cheaper for this generation. However, access to brands, new trends and fads are seen more in larger towns. The smaller town millennial may be a bit behind but is catching up. "Inter-study, we have noticed that a cross-town the millennials are very much responsible, goal-oriented, focused and conscious about their duties towards their family, housing and education."

McKinsey to Draw Up Jet's Turnaround Plan

BCC also roped in to suggest measures for boosting airline's revenue

Kala Vijayraghavan & Anirban Chowdhury

Mumbai: Jet Airways has appointed global management consulting firm McKinsey & Co to help it chart a turnaround plan even as India's second-biggest airline struggles to stay afloat and chairman Naresh Goyal approaches peers for infusion of funds.

A senior executive at the airline confirmed that Jet has appointed McKinsey for advising it on cost-cutting measures across functions. It has also roped in Boston Consulting Group to help it with revenue enhancement measures, he added.

The two global consultants have come on board at a time when Jet is grappling with a wide range of problems—financial and operational. It has delayed salaries, grounded at least eight planes, retrenched at least 20 managers, and allegedly featured in watch-lists of its lenders for likely defaults.

"As communicated earlier, Jet Airways is already engaged in implementing the cost-cutting elements of its turnaround strategy. Such initiatives typically require inputs from external advisers specialised consultants," a spokesperson told ET.

Jet has appointed consultants in the past, including global turnaround management expert Alvarez and Marsal, which worked with the airline for 15 months until 2013. Seabury Group had also come on board in 2013 just after Ethial Airways bought a 24% stake in the airline.

Both times, Jet had been in a precarious financial situation facing depleting cash reserves and mounting debt. At least two of the big four accounting companies, KPMG, Deloitte, PwC and EY, have been appointed.

A person in the know said last year Jet had enlisted the services of four small firms, including the National Institute of Industrial Engineering, to come up with strategies to improve

Several suggestions from both Seabury and Alvarez on streamlining operations and rationalising manpower were not implemented, said an industry executive, referring to the outcome of earlier engagements.

For the last couple of months, Jet has divided salary payments into two equal tranches, but it has been unable to pay even the deferred 50% on time. In August, the airline's senior management took pay cuts of 25%. It asked pilots and technicians to take similar cuts but they refused.

Credit rating agency ICRA has already downgraded Jet Airways' long-term borrowing power. Jet is in talks with investors to sell a stake in Jet Privilege, the loyalty programme

IL&FS Shortlists BDO, Grant Thornton as Auditors

Board to take a final decision on forensic auditor within a week

Pavan Burugula & Sachin Dave

Mumbai: Troubled infrastructure developer and lender Infrastructure Leasing & Financial Services Ltd has shortlisted Indian arms of Belgium-based BDO and Chicago-headquartered Grant Thornton to investigate alleged irregularities in its operations, a person close to the company told ET.

The board of directors of IL&FS is set to take a final decision on the forensic auditor within one week, one of the persons told ET.

The appointed auditors will be mandated to evaluate the audit reports of IL&FS and its 200 plus subsidiaries dating back five years.

Given voluminous nature of the task, there are chances that both BDO and GT are told to probe possible irregularities, said one of the persons close to the development. The board of IL&FS is also planning to appoint two-three smaller domestic players to help in the audit, the person said.

Besides verifying the accounts of the holding company and all its subsidiaries, the forensic auditors will also have to examine several other documents, including statements that were submitted by the infrastructure company to its auditors in the past and records of the asset sales undertaken by IL&FS in the last few years, the sources said.

"Serious Fraud Investigation Office (SFIO) is already investigating the irregularities and the firm would be required to supply documents to the investigations," said one of the persons cited earlier.

The chosen auditors will be mandated to conduct the audit in an expedited manner and submit a report in less than three months.

The big four auditors—EY, PwC, Waterhouse, Deloitte and KPMG—could not be considered for internal investigations due to conflict of interest, said one of the persons cited above.

People in the know said the internal investigations would include not just a financial probe but even the operational aspect.

"The investigators could look in to past financial dealings, cash flows from various assets, expense payments of top executives and even scrutinise some of the allegations like kickbacks and bribery," said a partner with a forensic team at one of the big four. "Such an investigation could take anywhere between three to four months," the person told ET.

In this regard, some of the loans that IL&FS doled out will also come under the scanner. SFIO suspects that the infrastructure company had sanctioned loans to shell entities whose end beneficiaries could be the beleaguered management or their immediate family.

"The audit will also need some of the information to be validated by the foreign regulators. In the current stage, the magnitude of the fraud is still unknown. Once the process starts, the scope of audit could be expanded as deemed fit," said another person cited above.

SoftBank Likely to Invest in Essel Group's 500 MW Solar Plant

Rachita.Prasad@timesgroup.com

Mumbai: SoftBank's arm SB Energy is close to signing a pact to invest in a 500 megawatt solar power plant being developed by the Essel Group in Rajasthan, according to sources directly involved with the deal.

Essel Group is in early stages of developing a solar power plant in Rajasthan with a total capacity of 750 MW. "This investment will help SoftBank fast forward its plan as it will have all the necessary infrastructure. This will reduce the time to build a plant from 12-15 months to less than six months," an executive involved with the deal said.

Essel Group's spokesperson confirmed deal, but declined to give details, while a SoftBank spokesperson said, "We don't comment on market speculations." SoftBank is bullish on the Indian solar energy space and has plans to invest $1 trillion in the sector. It has a presence here through SB Energy's joint ventures with Bharti Enterprises and Taiwan's Futucom Technologies. In October, SoftBank chief Masayoshi Son offered to supply free electricity to India once the 25-year power purchase agreements of SB Energy came to an end. The company has urged the government in the past to offer bulk tenders for solar power plants so that it can expedite its plan to invest $1 trillion here.
