Heavy rains flood across northeast US

ASSOCIATED PRESS
New York

Heavy rain swept across parts of the US Northeast on Monday night, inundating sections of New York and New Jersey with flooding that stranded vehicles in roadways, closed subway lines and led to the declaration of a state of emergency. Flash flood watches and warnings were in place in parts of New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and surrounding areas as downpours moved through the region.

New Jersey Gov. Phil Murphy declared a state of emergency due to flash flooding and heavy rainfall, advising people to stay indoors and avoid unnecessary travel.

A flood warning was also issued for Staten Island, which had seen about 4 to 6 inches of rain.

Video posted to social media by Chris showed floodwaters being a major problem in South Plains, New Jersey, in a standstill, stranding buses. Some buses were stuck in New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and surrounding areas as downpours moved through the region.

Emergency services agency wrote on the social platform on X that parts of the city and mid Hudson were getting hit with flash floods. Video posted on social media showed flooding down into a Manhattan railway station, submerging the platform, and passengers made a train watch. Another photo appeared to show passengers standing on a train track to avoid the water beginning to soak the floor. Parts of the Manhattan railway station in New York, such as the northbound lanes of the New Mill River Parkway and the Cross Bronx Expressway, were temporarily closed due to flooding and at least one downtown fire.
